

ARTICLE APPEARED
ON PAGE A-26

NEW YORK TIMES
29 November 1983

Briefing

Mission Possible

The works of tinkers, tailors and soldiers are readily seen in Washington museums, but there is no national showcase for espionage. But nonconfidential agents on Capitol Hill are trying to change this.

Their mission is the creation of a National Historical Intelligence Museum. Control for the mission is Senator Barry Goldwater, whose supporting operators include Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan. The two were instrumental in a recent overt action in the Senate that led to approval of a resolution stating the the Senate was in favor of such a museum, which would be financed not by the Government, but by private donations.

If the private donations do not materialize, the mission could self-destruct.

James F. Clarity
Warren Weaver Jr.